The injury from the workplace and making claims for the injury is normally emotionally and physically demanding. This is because the injured person must likewise peruse an injury claim whilst also suffering from the injury.

Under the workers insurance system, staff are given guaranteed compensation for accepted claims in exchange for giving up their right to take legal action against work-related injuries. The employer finances the program through premiums. This is of benefit to the employer, who is given protection from court cases under this system of collective liability. Hurt employees and their love ones are given just compensation, whilst costs are spread amongst employers.

Nonetheless, workers could take legal action against employers in some situations. Personnel can file a suit against employers in trades which are exempt from the workers insurance system. Personnel can take legal action against fellow personnel if they were "outside the course of their employment" when the injury took place. A worker could be entitled to benefits under the insurance plan with respect to a disease or an injury, and could likewise be entitled to sue an individual in respect of the injury; for example, a person driving in the course of their employment may sue the driver of the vehicle who injured them.
